He Mesmerized Them. The crown prosecutor of the city of Wol verhampton, England, is in a quandary. The police there have in custody a young man whose name is Lewis Albert, a gradu ate of Oxford University. Soon after he left college he became interested in m smerism, mind reading and hypnotism, and as a result of natural gif.s or close study, soon be came so expert that for a time he traveled about giving exhibitions of his powers. He acquired a wonderful influence over the will power of certain classes of people and established such a reputation that he might have made his zhibitions very profitable but for an unfortunate penchant for the flowing bowl. This brought him so low that three months ago he turned up in Wolver-bampton in rags and without money or friends. Then he began to hypnotize with a vengeance. Small shopkeepers, usually women, began to discover that the contents of their tills very mysteriously dwindled af of their tills very mysteriously dwindled af-ter a visit from the urbane stranger. Just could tell, but when they found, on comparing notes, that their losses invariably followed the visits of the polite Albert, they set the police to watch bim. Then some start ling discoveries were made. His custom was to enter a shop, make a purchase of some trifle and put down a copper in pay ment. Then the hypnotizing or mes-merizing process must have been brought into requisition, for the shopkeeper in every case took up the copper and handed out the change for a sovereign, which the young man promptly pocketed. In only one case while the police were on his track was there a failure to befog his victim in this way. The detective who followed him about was mystified for a long time, being utterly un-able to account for the hallucination which invariably seized Albert's victims and led them to mistake a copper coin for a gold sovereign, and it was only after discovering his professional record that he began to un derstand it. Albert's last victim young man, aged nineteen, the attendant at the box office of a theatre in Wolverhampthe box cince of a theatre in wolvernamp-ton. He stepped to the window, boldly asked for a shilling ticket, handed the boy a dirty scrap of newspaper, and received as change without the slightest hesitation on the part of the boy four sovereigns and nineteen shillings. While walking off with this he was arrested by the officer, who had been shadowing him for two weeks. The boy in the box-office was dumfounded when his attention was called to the scrap of newspaper in his cash box, and still stoutly insisted that the gentleman had handed him a five-pound note. He remembers, however, that a peculiar sensation came over him, which be describes as a sort of numbness, when the man first approached the window of the office. The legal status of Albert's offence is very difficult to deter mine, as it is without a precedent, and good lawyers say there is no law in England to

QUEER STORY .- A story, which reads like a romance from the pen of Jules Verne, inspired by Capt. Kidd, and thoughts of his far famed hidden treasure, appear in a Denver, Col. paper. The article purports to be the experience of a Colorado Springs physician who, last Sunday, was asked by two mountaineers to accompany them to a point 9 miles distant, to set the limb of a man who was accidentally shot. The physician was blindfolded and kept in that condition until he reached a cave, which entering and having the bandage removed from his eyes, he found to be one of the most wonderful places he had ever heard of. The sides of the cave seemed to glitter strangely, and with an array of gems which scintillated like a sulray of gems which scintillated like a sultan's jewel box. When the last splint had been applied to the injured limb, the doctor was sitting on a flour sack, wiping the perspiration from his brow. What an uncanny place this was! Where was he? On earth, or below in the bowels of the globe, where gnomes delve in precious metals and applied against a from the control of the globe. goblins gloat over disappointed seekers after wealth. The five men present were rugged, hearty specimens of American manhood, and no misshapen forms lent color to the dread suspicions which had begun to form in the doctors mind. The fact could not be credit-ed. If it was gold; fabulous wealth lay ail about him. Previous to leaving the doctor was presented with a large piece of the metal. Then he was blindfolded and taken home. The nugget, when put to test, proved to be gold of fine quality. In conclusion, the paper says: "This is no fairy story. This paper came into possession of the facts through the gentleman himself. He is now organizing an expedition to find the mysterious cave."
